SUMMARY OF THE PROJECT:

The fairy tale represents a universal narrative genre that can be found in the oral tradition of each people and group and that is handed down from one generation to another, gradually changing and adapting to changes in time and space. Through fairy tales we can then discover the characteristics and differences that characterize a group, a country, a way of life; enter for a moment through the suggestion and magic of the word narrated in the daily life of a village, a land and a people.

Fairy tales remind us of the countless analogies and similarities between distant contexts, places, environments. The good and the bad, the trials and the hero, the princess and the evil spirits, the stages of life and growth: these are motifs and themes present in the narratives here and elsewhere. They constitute the weft and the warp of stories that have "travelled" through the world and have coloured themselves, here and there, with nuances, references, chiaroscuros drawn on the way. The path of the imaginary is therefore a path of many links; ancient contaminations overlap, among myths, legends and fairy tales and changes that follow the evolution of the culture in which it originates and of which it feeds. The story and oral tradition enclose a network of deep meanings through which man interprets and explains the world, its laws, organization and social life, the why of all things and all living beings. Even in the extreme variety and richness of languages, situations, environments, events that characterize the fairy tales of all countries, the collective imagination leads back each time to the essential discoveries about the human condition, life and death, friendship and love, fear and desires. The imaginary therefore has the power to unite peoples and cultures transversally and, at the same time, to tell about their specificity.

Discovering and rediscovering together the fairy tales of here and elsewhere becomes an instrument of comparison and knowledge between different cultural traditions, worlds and peoples. To immerse and let kids freely immerse themselves in the fantasy world, offering the widest repertoire of fairy tales everywhere, can be a way to recreate a "dive" into the collective imagination and let it act with its own forces of enchantment, potential, possibilities...

OBJECTIVES:

- To know and recognize other contexts and ways of living
- Trace, through fairy tales, similarities and differences, commonalities and specificities
- Enhance different alphabets, languages and scriptures
- Stimulating positive attitudes and curiosity towards each other and other cultures
- Increasing the willingness to welcome and democratic coexistence
- Overcoming compassionate attitudes towards distant countries
- Stimulate motivation to read by bringing out the pleasure of reading
